The Future is Behind Us: The Work of Jaret Vadera

by Diane McClure

Interdisciplinary artist Jaret Vadera often parodies the way individuals imagine themselves against the way others imagine them. For Vadera, the reality of identity is not static. It cannot be reduced to a political equation or an overgeneralization. His investigation into what it means to exist beyond binary notions of identity is extremely relevant in this twenty-first-century moment of transition in the American psyche, when conversations on internationality abound. His navigation of this terrain will be on view in "CTRL+ALT: A Culture Lab on Imagined Futures," presented by the Smithsonian Asian Pacific America Center this weekend. Featuring artworks, performances, and dialogues, the two-day lab takes place at the intersection of the former Penn River Mart, an iconic shopping landmark in New York’s Chinatown that recently closed its doors due to rising rent.

The project, curated by Adriel Luis, Kaliwatu Curns, and Lawrence-Mitch But Davis, is a follow-up to “Crosswise: A Culture Lab on Internationality,” held in May at the Smithsonian Arts and Industries Building in Washington, D.C., a similar presentation that addressed issues of race, gender, class, ethnicity, religion, sexuality, and disability. This iteration includes work from a racially diverse group of forty-younger artists and scholars, a significant portion of whom are of Asian descent. Vadera is showing work alongside artists such as Saya Woolfalk, Chinatown Art Brigade, and EU Sposky, who explore imagined worlds of tribal identities, gentrification, and experimental sonoarcheotypes, respectively. Much of the selection of work highlights and honors the forty-five-year history of Penn River Mart, which opened out of a quarter-million-dollar rent hike last spring, and is currently exploring online rental options.

The positioning of "CTRL+ALT" as a lab—rather than, say, an exhibition or symposium—suits accommodation Vadera’s practice, which is grounded in process as opposed to product. His interests lie in community building and research-based projects in lieu of objects, questions in lieu of conclusions. To dissemble inherited notions of identity, Vadera proposes processes that involve either accepting an ambivalence toward identifying with one group or flat-out rejecting preconceived narratives of racial identity that lack nuanced and complexity.

Vadera’s work for "CTRL+ALT" presents a constellation of ideas through video, photography, and sculpture. Vadera is known for his corner installation space assimilation wall-mounted photographs with science-fiction imagery; a video monitor broadcasting live from outer space; and a translucent pod beneath a flag representing the 300 million-year-old supervolcano Pangea. The nine works in the installation activate potential readings when considered in relationship to one another.

Boundaries and arbitrary carry no currency in Vadera’s work. Some works directly disavow allegiance to the idea of nationalism. Vadera believes that culture shared through food, language, and history—not in state-sponsored agendas. One work builds on his 2014 piece No Country, a world map with every territorial reference to place (names of towns, regions, and countries) blacked out with a marker. Its next incarnation, Emperor of No Country, on view here, is a royal cloak, draped on a mannequin, composed of a similar black-marked map.

Empire of No Country and its predecessor reference the role of language in imperialism and colonization. The work is part of “Pangea,” a larger series about the constructed sense of nation-states in relation to Vadera’s fantasy narrative of ancient human history, when humans—or one species—shared a single supercontinent, and, in Vadera’s imagination, were ruled by one emperor, if any. A second piece from the “Pangea” series, A Flag for No Country, is also included in the show. It is a flag in one solid color, an amalgamation of hues from national flags in the world.

Vadera celebrates ambivalence. In his writing and in interviews he likes to refine the terms as multivalence—a state of being that becomes comfortable for those who learn to navigate their international identities on their own terms. His work inhabits a fluid field where an ethereal, as-versus-them, divide-and-conquer mindset is of little value, one where new possibilities are always on the horizon and personal agency reigns supreme.

Vadera’s ability to pivot and undo-switch is undeniably rooted in his Indian and Filipino heritage, his multicultural upbringing in Toronto, his tenure as an MFA student at Yale University, his global travels, and his participation in multiple spheres of the New York art world over the last two decades. This complex, layered existence in various social milieus offers fertile ground for envisioning possible futures, as well as exposure to the ill that plague humanity. As he utters this in a catalogue essay for “Double Blind: Art of the South Asian Diaspora,” a 2014 group show at New Jersey’s William Paterson University, “Identity is as real as death. It is as real as desire, as torture. As real as seduction, as the prison-industrial complex. As real as money, and mobs, and visas, and the War on . . . whatever the war is on now.”
